This brochure was written by Charles Parson, who, with these lines, was also responsible for its production.

10 Commercial Wharf

When Commercial Wharf was built in 1898, a terrible change in the life of the waterfront begins. The building was designed by Frank Furness, the architect who built the Philadelphia Museum of Art. The building was built of brick and stone and had a large central tower. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870.

11 Sewer Wharf

When Sewer Wharf was built in 1898, a terrible change in the life of the waterfront begins. The building was designed by Frank Furness, the architect who built the Philadelphia Museum of Art. The building was built of brick and stone and had a large central tower. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870.

12 Commercial Wharf

When Commercial Wharf was built in 1898, a terrible change in the life of the waterfront begins. The building was designed by Frank Furness, the architect who built the Philadelphia Museum of Art. The building was built of brick and stone and had a large central tower. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870.

13 Sewer Wharf

When Sewer Wharf was built in 1898, a terrible change in the life of the waterfront begins. The building was designed by Frank Furness, the architect who built the Philadelphia Museum of Art. The building was built of brick and stone and had a large central tower. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870.

14 Commercial Wharf

When Commercial Wharf was built in 1898, a terrible change in the life of the waterfront begins. The building was designed by Frank Furness, the architect who built the Philadelphia Museum of Art. The building was built of brick and stone and had a large central tower. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870.

15 Sewer Wharf

When Sewer Wharf was built in 1898, a terrible change in the life of the waterfront begins. The building was designed by Frank Furness, the architect who built the Philadelphia Museum of Art. The building was built of brick and stone and had a large central tower. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870.

16 Commercial Wharf

When Commercial Wharf was built in 1898, a terrible change in the life of the waterfront begins. The building was designed by Frank Furness, the architect who built the Philadelphia Museum of Art. The building was built of brick and stone and had a large central tower. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870. The building was the first to be constructed on the waterfront in Philadelphia since 1870.